Programme objectives
The Master in Human Resource Management aims to provide graduates with both conceptual and operational skills in the field of HRM. The goal is to train professionals who can meet the requirements of organisations wishing to optimise their HR support or assess their way of operating. By the end of the programme, graduates will have acquired both general HRM skills and the intellectual skills necessary for positioning HRM in the context of a company’s development.

Programme’s added value
The Master in HRM encourages students to be active (case studies, consulting assignments, workshops, team assignments, discussions with external speakers, residencies, etc.), and is designed to focus on an independent and critical analysis of HR policies and organisational consulting practices. In addition to conventional lecture classes, the programme includes a very practical aspect based on carrying out consulting assignments within an organisation, with required results. With this original and effective approach, students gain valuable professional experience.

Teaching methods
The Master in human resource management combines a number of different teaching methods. The study programme alternates between learning basic concepts, practical field experience and individual and group work, with the focus put on both pragmatism and criticism.

The accent is put on:
- the capability to analyse situations critically;
- the acquisition and testing of HRM methods;
- assignments in companies;
- the dissertation.

Master in Human Resources Management
Focus Professional

This Master programme has two main focuses: human resource management in its true sense, and organisational studies (public and private companies, administrations, associations, etc.) in their main dimensions: the human dimension of management, the legal, budgetary and economic aspects of HRM, and training, counselling, and intervention methodologies. The programme provides the intellectual tools needed for a critical approach to understanding and intervening in the human dimensions of management. Teaching is done through case studies in various organisations, helping graduates quickly launch their professional career.
